They reright of every member, promptly to check all such the principles and considerations which the commit tee have stated, is a painful duty, but one which they must perform without favor or prejudice.

In the first place, they report to the Senate, as their unanimous opinion, that Mr. Foote is entirely innocent of any design or desire to assassinate Mr. Benton. But they are bound to say, that at various times during the present session, Mr. Foote, without any sufficient provocation, so far as the committee are informed, indulged in personalities towards Mr. Benton of the most offensive and insulting character, such as were calculated to arouse the fiercest resentment of the human bosom. These were suffered by Mr. Benton for a long time with great forbearance. On the 26th of March last they were renewed; and, on this occasion, Mr. Benton manifested his resentment with much violence. On the succeeding day he recriminated, in language equally personal disorderly and abusive. He complained that the Senate permitted such outrages, and announced his purpose, if the Senate did not protect him in future. to redress the wrong, cost what it might.

On the 17th of April last. Mr. Foote spoke again, and used the language which is set forth in the narrative of the committee. This language the committee consider personal and offensive, because its application to Mr. Benton could not be misunderstood. and because, in effect and by implication, it charged him with being a calumniator. That Mr. Foote was not promptly called to order by the presiding officer. or some member of the Senate, must have been owing to the fact that the collocation of the passages in the speech was such that the personality was not immediately perceived. Indeed, the application of the term "calumniator" to Mr. Benton was not made until the moment when the disorder arose. At that point, in the remarks of Mr. Foote. Mr. Benton left his seat and proceeded towards Mr. Foote in the manner already mentioned. He was not armed, nor does it appear that he ever has carried arms, but the contrary. This, however, it is believed, was not known to Mr. Foote.

What his intention was, the committee have not been able to ascertain by direct testimony; but they cannot avoid the inference, from all the circumstances, that he intended either to make a personal assault upon Mr. Foote or to intimidate him. His manner, coupled with his previous declarations, was certainly such as to justify Mr. Foote in the belief that the first was his intention, as it evidently did excite such apprehensions in the minds of many, if not most all. of the Senators who witnessed it. Mr. Foote then left his seat, without advancing towards Mr. Benton. but in fact placing himself further from him, and, though he drew a deadly weapon, he did not present it. and readily gave it up when demanded of him. No blow was struck-no shot fired-but there was imminent danger that the Senate chamber would be the scene of a deadly and criminal en-

The committee cannot too strongly condemn the practice of wearing arms in the Senate chamber. Ours should be the deliberations of peace, patriotism, and wisdom; uninterrupted by personalities, uncontrolled by force, untimidated by preparations for deadly conflict. Senators should rely for defence upon the Senate, whose high duty it is to protect its members from injury or insult, and whose practice should furnish a perfect guaranty of such protection. A different course would convert the halls of legislation into bloody arenas, and destroy the value, if not the existence, of the institutions from which spring our glory and our good.

The committee have searched the precedents, and find that no similar scene has ever been witnessed in the Senate of the United States. Personal conflict has, on several occasions, occured in the House of Representatives and in the British House of Commons. In the former body, no punishment has ever been inflicted, the House being satisfied with the atonement of an ample apology. In the British Parliament, the House, in one case, comitted a member to the Tower for striking another: but, in general, they have proceeded no further than to put the ofconding member in the custody of the sergeant-atarms, and their decision has been made upon view, and not after the report of a committee.

the committee forbear to recommend any action to the Senate. They hope that the strong condemnation of the personalities which led to threatened violence, their censure of the attempt, by a member, to avenge himself in the presence of the Senate, and of the practice of carrying arms in the Senate chamber, the practice of carrying arms in the Senate chamber, the practice of carrying arms in the Senate chamber, the practice of carrying arms in the Senate chamber, the practice of carrying arms in the Senate chamber, the practice of the Senate chamber, the practice of the Senate chamber, the practice of carrying arms in the Senate chamber, the practice of the Senate chamber of the will be a sufficient rebuke, and a warning not unheeded in future.
